STATE PARKS PROPOSE CHANGE

handicapped," Bolen added.

Individuals desiring to comment on this change are invited to submit their views in writing before November 27, 1979 to Mr. Ben H. Bolen, Commissioner, Division of Parks, 1201 State Office Building, Richmond, Va. 23219.

It's Time To Fertilize!

This years crops are not completely harvested. Could it be time to start preparing for next year? We all know it's true and are aware of several things we need to be doing in preparation for the next crops.

All of our perennial forage crops such as alfalfa, clover and pastures should be fertilized now. Applications of phosphorus and potassium this fall will help maintain the stand through the winter months and insure an adequate supply of these nutrients for early growth next spring. If it is a grass stand and you plan to use fertilizer nitrogen to get the production, it would be a good idea to delay the application of this nutrient until late winter. This will help avoid any possible leaching losses and will place the nitrogen more closely to the time the grass plants will use it.

Have you seeded your small grain but failed to apply the phosphorus and potassium shown to be needed by a soil test? If so, these nutrients should be applied as soon as possible. If the small grain has not been seeded, applying fertilizer through the drill at the time of seeding or broadcasted and disked in just before seeding will give greater yields than if the fertilizer is topdressed. Where no-tillage are to be double cropped behind the small grain, be sure to apply enough for the beans too.

If you are farming in the Piedmont or Appalachian areas, you can apply all the nitrogen that will be needed for small grains this fall. In the Coastal Plains area the probability of losing a significant amount of nitrogen through leaching is too great to apply the total amount at seeding time. Therefore, we recommend that only ¼ to ⅓ of the total nitrogen be applied in the fall in that area and that the remainder be applied in late February or March.

Because of possible nitrogen leaching losses, applications of this nutrient for next years corn crop should be delayed until a few days before the crop is planted.

Phosphorus and potassium that will be needed for next years corn and soybean crops can be applied this fall and winter. We are never concerned about phosphorus leaching losses because phosphate fertilizers react with the soil and stay where they are placed. Broadcast applications of phosphorus should be fall will be as effective in increasing crop yields as will applications made next spring.

We do not have to worry about potassium leaching losses because it is held in the soil by the clay and organic matter. However, the loamy sand soils of the Coastal Plains have very little clay and organic matter in their surface layers and have a limited ability to hold potassium in the plow layer. Potassium that is washed out of the plow layer by leaching stops as soon as it hits the clay in the subsoil. If the clayey subsoil layer is within about twenty inches of the surface, crops will use it very effectively. Thus the only soils on which we need to be concerned about potassium leaching losses and avoid fall applications are the deep, Coastal Plain sands with very little subsoil clay accumulation and those soils in which the clayey subsoil layer is more than about twenty inches below the surface.

nuclear-powered Los Angeles-aircraft carrier and two nuclear-powered Los Angeles-class attack submarines.

"The carrier, alone, will mean 5,000 new jobs for the Tidewater area," Warner said. "Newport News is the only place in the world where shipyard facilities and skilled workers needed to build a nuclear carrier is.

Warner said he "is optimistic" that one and maybe both of the attack sbbmarines also will be built in Newport News, which will create even more jobs for the Hampton Roads area.

Approved by the Appropriations Committee and recommended to the full Senate was $2.1 billion for the carrier and $717.6 million for the submarines, all of which were authorized in a conference report passed by the Senate and the House and sent to the President for his signature on October 26.

Contracts Approved By State Highway And Transportation Commission

Contracts to replace or upgrade 13 or more bridges on coal-hauling roads in Southwest Virginia and to install reflective pavement markers along almost 80 miles of roadway have been approved for award by the State Highway and Transportation Commission.

They are among 25 contracts totaling $9.7 million approved on the basis of low bids received in September.

J. E. Evans and Son Construction Company, Inc. of Appomattox was awarded a $25,054 contract in Amherst County for Secondary 629 for grading, draining, and paving 0.4-of-a-mile of new two-lane access roadway from Secondary 617 to Thrashers Creek County Park near Fancy Hill.

Pearson & White Construction, Inc. of Appomattox was awarded a $125,923 contract in Amherst County for the grading, draining, and paving 1.4 miles of two-lane roadway along Route 610 and 625 and a new access roadway to the Stonehouse Creek County Park south of Gidsville.

The bridge projects are part of a two-year, $7 million program authorized by the 1979 General Assembly, along with legislation aimed at curbing future road and bridge damage by overloaded coal trucks.

Altogether, contracts have now been awarded for replacement or repair of 23 of the 113 bridges included in the modernization program.

The slightly raised reflective pavement markers, to be installed on heavily traveled roads, are intended to provide an extra margin of safety for motorists.

Consumer's Corner

Strategies to Withstand Rising Food Prices

By Glen H. Mitchell
Extension Specialist, Consumer Education
Virginia Tech College of Home Economics

Even a diet based on dried beans and whole grains won't provide permanent protection against inflation, but a drastic change in eating habits is one alternative price-conscious consumers may consider.

If food prices continue to rise and your income doesn't keep pace, you're going to get caught--there's no way out. Through some basic dietary changes and adjustments in food shopping, storage and use techniques, most consumers can achieve significant savings on food.

One important aspect of low-cost food shopping is choosing the right place to buy food. In most communities, there are many types of food outlets, including delicatessens, ethnic and specialty stores, food co-ops, farmers' markets, u-pick farms, and limited-selection stores as well as supermarkets.

When choosing among these outlets, consumers should consider their transportation costs and the value of their time and labor, if required, along with the quality of merchandise and general price levels.

Supermarkets probably offer the most economical choices for most homemakers. In light of recent research which suggests that there are consistent store-to-store differences in the prices of a given assortment of goods, consumers may do well to shop regularly at a store that offers the best prices for their particular needs.

To take advantage of specials, shoppers may prefer to shop at two or more stores if this does not take them out of the way.

In selecting foods, consumers should remember that popular foods and those in season are usually cheaper than others, and that produce items that are attractive and regular in size, shape, and color are more expensive.

When store or generic brands are available, consumers should consider substituting them for more expensive national brands. Generics may not be uniform in size, color, or texture, but they are safe and nutritious, and offer savings of as much as 40 percent over national brands.

Home canning or freezing may cut food bills, but preparation time and energy costs should be considered. The cost of running a freezer, for instance, may wipe out any savings on its contents.

Buying "specials" in quantity is a realistic measure for consumers who have storage room. Quantity buyers should be aware of normal price ranges and be able to recognize real bargains.

Generally, highly processed convenience foods are more expensive than fresh items, but home preparation time and energy costs, as well as taste, are factors to consider.

Some convenience foods, like frozen orange juice and cake mixes, are less expensive than their home-prepared equivalents. Most meat entrees, baked goods, and desserts, on the other hand, should be prepared at home for greatest savings.

Improved shopping, storage, and use techniques will lower food bills to some extent; changes in consumption patterns to emphasize foods that provide cheaper sources of essential nutrients can mean greater reductions.

According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, meat, poultry, fish, and eggs make up the largest part--32.2 percent--of expenditures for food to be eaten at home. Prices for items in this group rose 14 percent, more than those in any other, during the last year.

Foods in this group are of major importance in most consumers' diets. For those concerned about cost savings, this is the place to start.

Consumers can cut expenses in this area by purchasing less expensive cuts or types of meat, figuring pries per serving rather than per pound, and putting more emphasis on egg and cheese dishes.

Using more whole grains, dried legumes, and milk as protein sources will further reduce costs. Meals built around non-meat sources must be balanced to provide complete protein, but a varied diet incorporation these products can be healthful as well as less expensive.

Cutting back on, or cutting out, sugars, sweets, and other snack foods can also reduce food bills considerably. Such products often are highly processed and expensive, and they provide few of the nutrients necessary in a balanced diet. Reduce your eating out and carry a "brown bag" to work.

These changes can be effective in cutting food costs only if customers are prepared to accept new foods and eating habits. Members of each family must work out patterns acceptable to them.
